The diverse geography and environment of our archipelagic nation have attracted over the millennia waves of migrations that brought with them extraordinary cultural influences. These inbound migrations interacted with indigenous existing traditions, mainly through a process of acculturation. These have included successive waves of Buddhism, Hinduism, Islam and Christianity that have intertwined in their beliefs and traditions over the centuries to leave a contemporary cultural legacy that is a multi-layered mosaic that has become one unique "Indonesian culture".

Most countries' histories are dramatically shaped by their geography, and none more so than Indonesia with its more than 17,000 islands. The live volcanoes that make Indonesia a key part of the "Ring of Fire" around the Pacific Rim and that still sear our country in modern times with short-term destruction are ironically also an important part of the building blocks of the different civilizations that have arisen within these islands. The outpouring of the volcanoes provided the rich fertile soil that covers Java and that made abundant agriculture possible. Their eruptions also gave the very rocks that were then shaped to construct our UNESCO-recognized World Heritage Sites such as Borobudur and Prambanan.

This geographical reality together with the unique creativity of over 300 ethnic communities that make up our nation have been the key factors in producing the rich cultural heritage of the Indonesian people today. This reality is aptly reflected in the proud motto on the official coat of arms of Indonesia: Bhinneka Tunggal Ika (Unity in Diversity).

In this modern age of globalization and modernization, we — the inheritors, stakeholders and stewards of this rich and precious cultural diversity based on local wisdom — are faced with the urgent question: what to do about Indonesia's cultural heritage? Of course it is our sincere desire that the cultural diversity and vitality that exists in contemporary Indonesia will continue to flourish and enrich the lives of future generations of Indonesians as well as visitors from abroad.

One important step in safeguarding the nation's cultural heritage — both tangible in the form of sites, and intangible as living heritage — is to raise public awareness through the publication of attractive and authoritative books that not only document our country's cultural wonders but also celebrate them as well. This publication is an ongoing effort in that direction by the Indonesian government working closely with the many concerned cultural stakeholders.

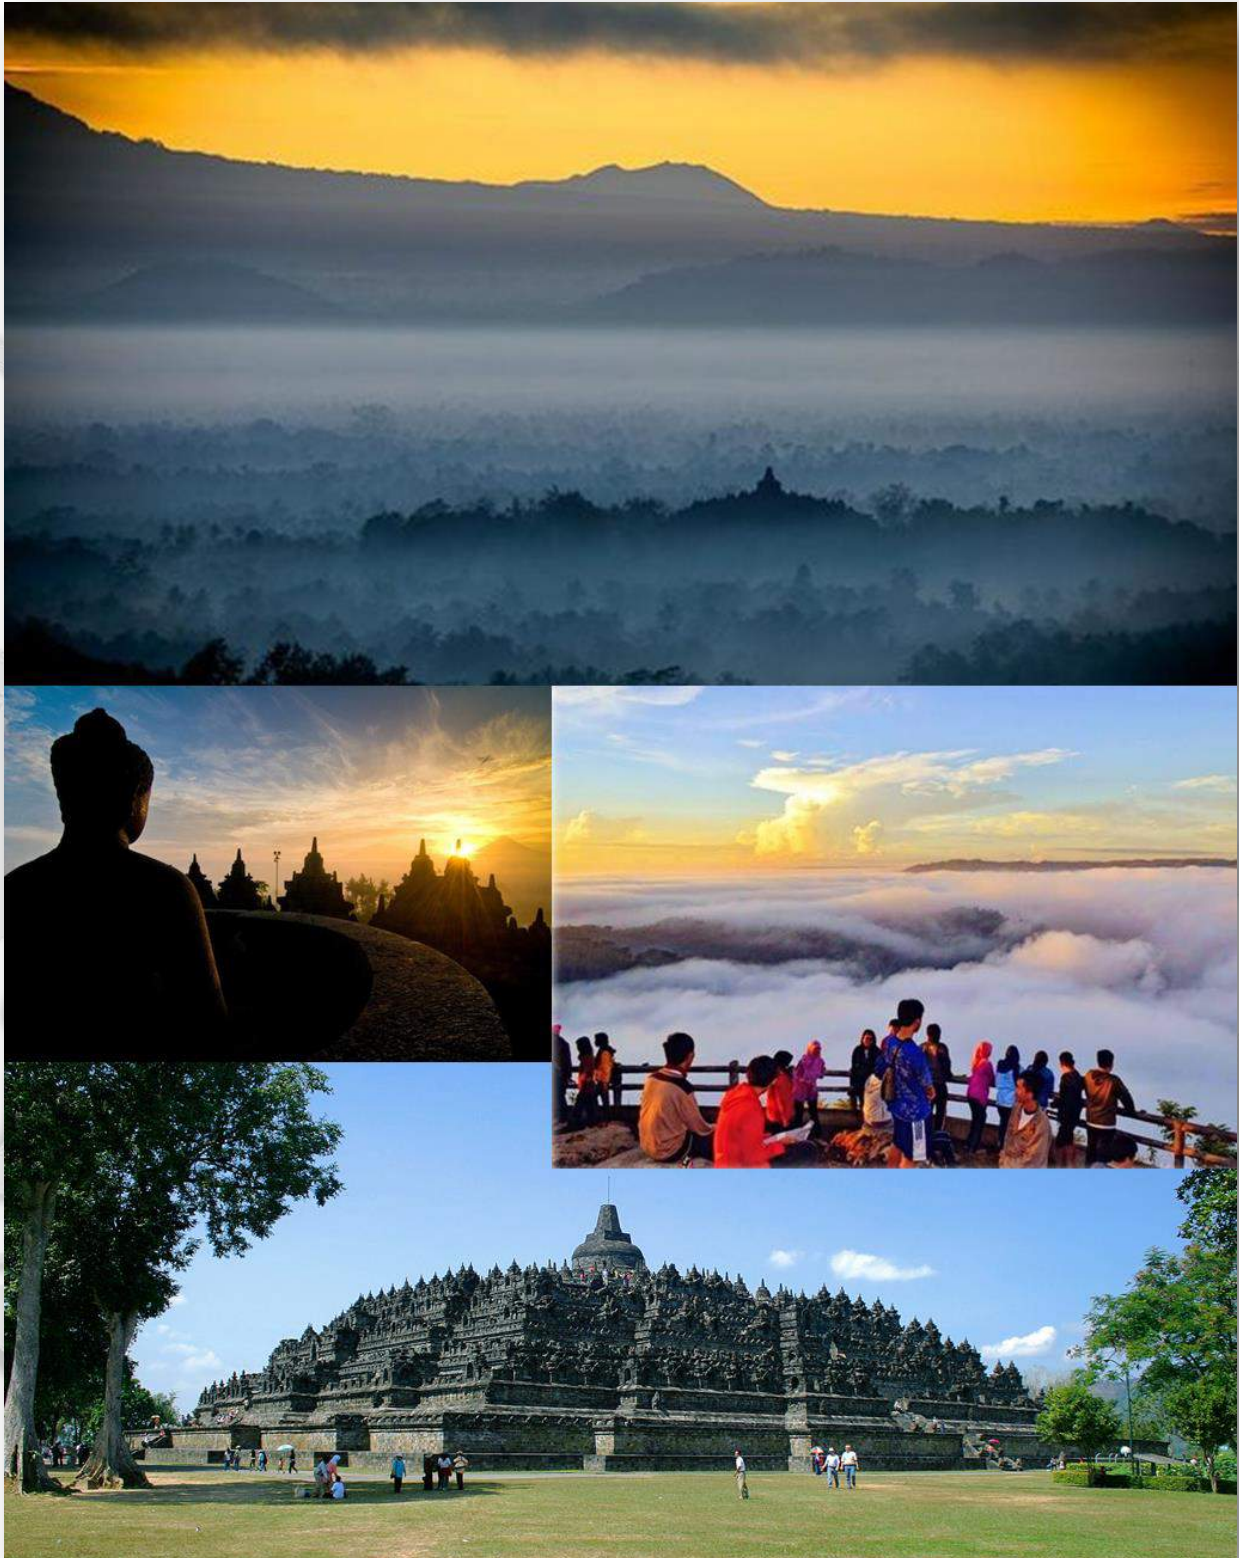

Indonesia's cultural diversity is shaped but not governed by its physical geography. It is a land of immense biodiversity, whether it be the Asian portion that has much in common with the continental mainland or the islands east of Bali that belong to a transitional zone east of the Wallace line leading to Australia. There are more than 17,000 islands, many with towering volcanoes, rugged mountain ranges and verdant tropical forests, some of them rainforests.

Indonesians recognize that the maritime area is just as important as the islands and thus refer to their country as Tanah Air Kita (Our Land and Water). This diverse landscape offers Indonesians many possibilities whether it be bustling port cities, elegant royal capitals and densely packed agrarian landscapes with fabled rice terraces, or isolated villages perched on high mountainsides or in the middle of impenetrable forests. Indonesia is thus simultaneously home to some of the world's most cosmopolitan and most reclusive societies known on earth, as both ways of living co-exist here.

Traditional ways of exploiting the bounty of these tropical islands vary a great deal, ranging from immensely skilled rice farmers of Java and Bali who manage complex systems of irrigation, to the palm and coconut harvesters of eastern Indonesia. The sweet potato growers of Papua practice forms of horticulture that are thought to be of immense antiquity whereas the swidden (slash-and-burn) cultivators of upriver Kalimantan clear forests to create rain-fed rice fields.

The sea also provides diverse livelihood opportunities, whether it be the small bands of fisherfolk who live predominantly at sea, known variously as Bajau Laut or Sea Gypsies, or the ocean explorers like the Bugis and Makassar people who ranged as far as Australia to trade with the Aborigines. Such was the skill of ancient Indonesian boat-builders and navigators that settlers from these islands eventually reached far off Madagascar. The 9th century AD temple complex of Borobudur famously bears relief carvings showing ships with billowing sails and complex tiers of outriggers, perhaps of the kind that once paved the sea routes between the archipelago and India.

Most Indonesians speak languages belonging to the Austronesian family and this links them to the settlers of Madagascar off the shores of Africa in the west and the myriad islands of the Pacific to the east, and the Filipinos and indigenous Taiwanese to the north. Numerous though speakers of Austronesian languages are, what should not be overlooked is that there are other significant language groupings, notably Papuan.

As befits a country with many ties to other civilization systems, there are many words of foreign origin in these indigenous tongues, especially in the national language, Bahasa Indonesia, a close relative of Malay. Contact with South Asia in the first millennium led to intensified trade and religious links with the rise of Srivijaya in the 7th century AD and thus Indonesian is replete with words of Sanskrit origin embracing religious, technical and educational terms.

Contact with the Arab world and Muslims of India led to an influx of Arabic terms, often of a religious, political or scientific nature. Chinese languages also exerted an influence on the Indonesian lexicon, and the last wave of historical influence comes from European colonizers who introduced words for 'butter', 'cheese' and 'shoes' (Portuguese), as well as military, administrative and legal terms (Dutch).
